Original publisher: Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala. : Air University Press, 2000 OCLC Number: ocm52162637 Subject: United States -- Armed Forces -- Decision making. Excerpt: . . . RIZER Building on chapter 2 s conclusion that institutional belief systems can exist in the US military, chapter 3 identifies and tests the presence of such a philosophy. It begins by presenting Samuel P. Huntingtons claim that the US military possesses an institutional philosophy that he calls conservative realism. For clarification, the chapter then contrasts this philosophy with its counterpart, liberalism. Finally, using recent civil-military relations studies, it tests Huntingtons claim regarding an institutionalized military philosophy. Chapter 4 further develops the conservative and liberal philosophies identified in chapter 3 by applying them to interna-tional relations. The chapter compares and contrasts the con-servative and liberal views of the world, especially regarding the use of military force. It explains why conservatives view war as a political instrument for furthering national interests, whereas liberals see war as a preventable aberration resorted to in the name of universal values. Finally, it uses a recent study to prove the US military indeed holds the conservative, national interest-based worldview. Chapter 5 outlines the Clinton administrations justification for war in Kosovo. Content analysis of various actors state-ments shows that the justifications clearly echo liberalisms philosophy, worldview, and conception of military interven-tion. Chapter 6 summarizes this papers findings. It concludes that the Pentagon resisted intervening militarily in Kosovo because the operation was undertaken for liberal values the military opposes. It then shows the greater implications of an institution-alized military aversion to humanitarian war, offering some points to ponder concerning such military actions in the future.
